TESTING & CALIBRATION SERVICES

Have you ever heard of third-party testing for supplements? Many supplement companies are very vague about whether they third-party test and, if they do, what all that entails. This blog aims to clear up the confusion and misconceptions about third-party testing for supplements. Additionally, you will learn about why third-party testing is so important in the supplement industry.

What does third-party testing mean?

You might see that a supplement company posted that their products are third-party tested and wonder what that means. Well, unfortunately, not all third-party testing is the same. Generally, what third-party testing means is that an organization that is not the supplement company itself evaluates a dietary supplement and vouches for its quality. The supplement company has to pay the third party and provide them with samples or entire bottles of their product to be tested.

What do they test for?

When a company has their product third-party tested, they could test for various things, including ingredient potency and accuracy (ingredient claims on the label=what is in the finished product), heavy metals, mold, and bacteria.

What a supplement company does or does not test for is exclusively up to that company. This means that they can pick and choose what they test for. Let's get into a little more detail about the different types of third-party testing.

Ingredient Potency & Accuracy

When third-party testing for supplements is done to check for ingredient potency and accuracy, the companies are making sure that what the supplement company claims as ingredients on their label aligns with what is actually in the product and the claimed amounts. For example, if a company claims that they have 15g of protein in their recovery formula, but the third-party testing results only show 12 grams, that supplement company is falsely labelling their product.

As you can tell, this type of third-party testing for supplements can be a considerable risk for a supplement company. The FDA monitors the nutrition and supplement labelling, and supplement companies can run into problems if they find out that they are over claiming or under claiming the ingredients in your product.

The supplement industry is full of supplements with inaccurate labels. An article by Harvard Health discussed a study that showed that over 20% of the 776 dietary supplements tested contained multiple unapproved ingredients. Surprisingly, the FDA only announced voluntary recalls for about half of these supplements.

Unfortunately for consumers, the supplement industry is not nearly as rigorously regulated like the prescription industry. Supplements with inaccurate labels will likely slip through and go unnoticed. This is why you must ensure that the supplement you are taking is third-party tested for potency and accuracy.
